

GRETSCH TAYLOR HAWKINS SNARE

£208 A great rock snare, or hawking his wares? Let's find out if this bird can sing...

WORDS: STUART WILLIAMS

Drummers tend to like Foo Fighters, mainly because they have two of the finest rock drummers of the last 20 years in their cohort. While Taylor Hawkins and Dave Grohl's playing styles differ, they share many aspects of their playing, not least their appreciation of great rock drum sounds. So, imagine our delight when we heard that Gretsch had announced a signature snare for the one-time Alanis Morissette sticksman. Fast-forward to today and Rhythm has taken delivery of his Hawkins-approved piece of Gretsch craftsmanship. Brace yourselves, this will get loud.

Build

Take a look at some of the signature snares from the most interesting rock drummers in recent years and you'll find distinction; Joey Jordison's 13"x6½" Pearl, Danny Carey's 14"x8" Sonor, Abe Cunningham's vented brass Tama model. In our mind, a signature Taylor Hawkins snare has been a long time coming. Interesting then, that he's opted for what is at first glance quite a pedestrian take on the signature snare format: 14"x6½", steel shell, triple-flanged hoops. There's no crazy esoteric ideas going on here, but it's far from generic. The 1mm black-nickel coating gives this drum an air of understated expense, and the only clue that it's a signature product comes from the 'Hawk' and squiggle engraved on the Gretsch badge. Elsewhere, you get 10 lugs, and 20-strand snare wires, and the Hawk comes fitted with a Remo Emperor-X batter straight out of the box.

Hands on

We'd have been accepting - it is a signature product after all - but disappointed if this snare could only do one thing. As it turns out, the main point we need to make about this drum is its versatility when it comes to tuning. Starting out in the middle of its range, we get a fat, loud and cutting rock snare sound. Some snares don't cope well with lower tunings, but take the black Hawk down and it works wonders. With the batter head about a turn off finger-tight, and snares loosened a bit, it delivers a low punch and full tone without any of the annoying buzzes and artefacts you sometimes get from slacker tunings, in part due to the Emperor-X. Other drum companies take note: it pays to include decent heads. Finally, cranking it up a bit takes a step towards Funkyrocktown: loud, cracking and it'll tear through walls of guitars to make sure you're heard.

Cynics have an axe to grind about signature gear. How do you make a simple, affordable steel snare more appealing? Put a rock star's name on it. Well, hats off to Hawkins and Gretsch. What you get for the money here is a very good quality snare that'll have you covered for any rock scenario from singer-songwriter to metal, and probably anything outside of that too. R

Essential spec

PRICE

£225

SHELL

Black nickel over steel

CONSTRUCTION

Solid

BEARING EDGE

30°

FINISHES

As shown

HOOPS

Triple-flanged (2.3mm)

SUPPLIED HEADS

Remo Emperor-X (batter) Ambassador (snare)

SHELL AVAILABILITY

14"x6½"

LUGS

10 per side

SNARE STRAINER

Gretsch side-pull

SNARE WIRES

20-strand Gretsch

CONTACT

GEWA Music
info@gewamusic.com
gretschdrums.com

HAWK LOGO

Taylor Hawkins' signature and hawk motif are engraved on the drum's Gretsch badge

VERDICT: Chad Smith's signature Pearl snare has built a reputation as a brilliant all-rounder on a budget over the last decade, and now Hawkins' Gretsch is set to do the same.

BUILD QUALITY ★★★★★
PLAYABILITY ★★★★★
VALUE FOR MONEY ★★★★★
RHYTHM RATING ★★★★★

Watch our Gretsch Taylor Hawkins Snare video demo at <http://bit.ly/hawkinssnare>